Beauty bloggers all over the internet (from Tik Tok to YouTube) claim that some oils are magic and will give better results than some heat protectants. Yes, to an extent, it's true, as good oil is a staple in any hairdresser or beauty guru's arsenal. They rehydrate and nourish hair and are perfect for taming annoying frizz, but unfortunately, they do not give your hair protection from the heat on the same level as a heat protector. So even by using oils which are beneficial for your health, you do have to use heat protectant to keep them damage free. Some oils can even cause more damage by allowing your flat iron to fry your hair so knowing which products are best for your hair when using a straightening iron is a must.

Most oils perform best when used on hair after it has been styled with heat as a finishing product. When using tools that

2.3. Quaternium 70 When used in heat protectants, quaternium-70 has several advantages. It offers a layer of defence against the hair abilities, Quaternium 70 has got its place as one of the main ingredients in the majority of heat protectants products. 2.4. Hydrolyzed Wheat Protein This is another common ingredient in cosmetics produced by the acid of wheat gluten. It nourishes and adds moisture to your hair for ultimate shine. Because it fortifies and shields the hair filaments from the inside out, becoming overly dry or fragile, which can cause breakage and broken ends. Additionally, this component can aid in reducing frizz and flyaways, giving hair a softer, simpler to manage appearance. The use of quaternium-70 on all hair kinds, including colour-treated and chemically-treated hair, is also possible because of its gentleness. Because of these hydrolyzed wheat protein, when used in heat protection products, aids in preventing heat damage making it an ultimate fit in the main ingredients for hair products. It functions by repairing any gaps or breaches in the hair barrier brought on by heat damage, which lessens frizz, breakage, and split ends. Additionally, by boosting the moisture content and natural shine of hair, hydrolyzed wheat protein can aid in improving its general health and look. 3. Which heat-protectant products are worth it?
